“Our clients know that we will go the distance for them. But we also help them make wise business and economic choices that fit their needs.”

Bigger isn't necessarily better when it comes to law firms. Lommen Abdo, considered a small to mid-size firm with its 39 lawyers, is poised to provide legal services effectively and efficiently, two traits that are virtues in this 2008 economy. Lommen Abdo's blend of practices creates a legal galleria for both individuals and businesses. Within its offices in Minnesota, Wisconsin and New York, you can find commercial litigators, personal injury lawyers, appellate advocates, corporate attorneys, entertainment and sports lawyers, estate planners, family law attorneys and many more.

“We are a unique band of attorneys with an entrepreneurial spirit and a foundation of legal excellence and business savvy,” said President Phillip A. Cole, who—along with his colleagues Roger V. Stageberg, Kay Nord Hunt, and Robert J. King, Jr.—was listed as a “Best Lawyer” in the annual Best Lawyers in America publication.

“Our clients know that we will go the distance for them,” says Kay Hunt, whose appellate practice regularly brings her before the Minnesota Supreme Court. “But we also help them make wise business and economic choices that fit their needs.”

“We've obtained both landmark decisions and landmark settlements for our clients this year,” says Bob King, head of Lommen

Abdo's personal injury practice. “We are proud of our reputation as tough trial lawyers and continue to work hard to enhance that reputation by finding ways to help our clients succeed.”

Clients range from businesses involved in intellectual property disputes; to people injured by medical mistakes; to companies acquiring other businesses; to musicians, filmmakers and sports figures with contract issues; to people who want a divorce or are having a custody dispute; to those that need an estate plan.

“Many of our corporate lawyers have owned their own businesses and invested in others. We understand small businesses because, not only do we represent them, we are one ourselves,” explains Roger Stageberg. “We have sat on both sides of the negotiating table and we bring that expertise and experience to every client matter.”
